Cleaning the StatucSource Column

        las = 2,
        cex.axis = 0.15)

#The first graph, a bar plot, illustrates the distribution of tweets across various source platforms. It reveals a highly skewed pattern, where a small number of dominant platforms, such as Twitter for iPhone and Twitter for Android, contribute the majority of tweets. Meanwhile, most other sources show minimal tweet counts. This emphasizes the significant role mainstream platforms play in driving Twitter activity, while less prominent sources have little impact on overall tweet volumes.

#The second graph provides a detailed list of the various platforms and apps used as tweet sources. It highlights the extensive diversity of tools integrated with Twitter, including both popular and niche platforms. The presence of many low-contribution sources suggests that some are specialized tools or automated systems (bots) with limited activity. This diversity showcases Twitter's versatility in accommodating a wide range of users and applications, from casual users to businesses leveraging automated posting tools.

The graph titled "Tweet Source Comparison" illustrates the distribution of tweets based on their source. The majority of tweets are posted using iPhone and Android, which dominate the chart with the highest counts. These two sources significantly outperform others, highlighting their widespread use among Twitter users. The third most common source is categorized as Others, though its count is notably lower compared to iPhone and Android. Meanwhile, platforms like iPad, ifttt, and dlvr.it contribute only a small fraction of tweets, indicating limited usage.

This distribution suggests that mobile devices, particularly iPhones and Android smartphones, are the primary tools for engaging on Twitter. The "Others" category likely represents a mix of niche or less common platforms. Automated tools like ifttt and dlvr.it are used sparingly, possibly for specific purposes such as scheduled or automated posts. Businesses and marketers looking to target Twitter users should prioritize strategies that cater to mobile users, particularly those on iPhone and Android devices, given their overwhelming share. Further analysis of the "Others" category might reveal additional insights about underutilized platforms or unique user behaviors.

tweetsDF$sentiment <- get_sentiment(tweetsDF$text, method = "syuzhet") tweetsDF <- tweetsDF %>% mutate(sentiment_category = case_when( sentiment > 0 ~ "Positive", sentiment == 0 ~ "Neutral", sentiment < 0 ~ "Negative"

  ))
sentiment_by_source <- tweetsDF %>% group_by(tweetSource, sentiment_category) %>% summarize(count = n(), .groups = 'drop') ggplot(sentiment_by_source, aes(x = tweetSource, y = count, fill = sentiment_category)) + geom_bar(stat = "identity", position = "dodge") + labs(

    title = "Sentiment Distribution by Tweet Source", x = "Tweet Source",
    y = "Number of Tweets",
    fill = "Sentiment Category"
  ) +
  theme_minimal()

Sentiment Distribution by Tweet Source
The grouped bar chart provides valuable insights into the sentiment distribution of tweets across different sources, such as iPhone, Android, and other platforms. By examining the chart, we can observe which sentiment is most dominant for each tweet source. For example, tweets from platforms like "iPhone" may have a higher proportion of Positive sentiment, while sources like "Android" could show a mix of Positive, Neutral, and Negative sentiments. This variation suggests that sentiment trends differ across platforms. Additionally, the chart reveals the volume of tweets per source, highlighting how certain platforms, like iPhone, generate more tweets compared to others like "dlvr.it" or "IFTTT". This discrepancy may indicate the popularity of certain sources. From a strategic standpoint, understanding these sentiment trends can be crucial for businesses or analysts, as positive sentiments could indicate more favorable user engagement, while negative sentiments from specific sources may signal user dissatisfaction or areas for improvement. Overall, the graph helps in recognizing patterns that can inform marketing strategies, customer engagement, and platform-related decision-making.
